The Journal here printed and the copy of the Act of Incorporation which precedes it, occupy about eighty-six pages in an ordinary note book of the period, thirteen inches long by eight in width and less than three-quarters of an inch thick. This is now in the Burton Historical Collection of the Detroit Public Library. The aim in this transcription has been to preserve the essential characteristics of Peter Audrain's quaint record, as far as the limitations of typography allow.

Introduction

To the Honorable, the Common Council of the City of Detroit, Gentlemen of the Council:

I propose to prepare for publication the first charter granted to Detroit by the General Assembly of the Northwest Territory at Chillicothe, January 18, 1802, together with the proceedings of the council that was appointed and elected under that charter. These proceedings extend from 1802 until the organization of the Territory of Michigan in 1805.

The proceedings end abruptly in June, 1805, a few days before the great fire that destroyed the village and most of its contents. Destructive as that fire was, we have to be thankful that, so far as is known, none of the official records of the place were burned.

The legislative proceedings that relate to Detroit up to the time of the fire are very interesting and I will undertake here to give a short account of them.

Michigan formed a part of what was called the Territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River. This is usually designated as the Northwest Territory. It was governed by the provisions of the Ordinance of 1787. Detroit was not under the jurisdiction of the United States until the British troops evacuated it in 1796, and the Americans took possession through the coming of General Anthony Wayne and his army in July of that year.

The people who were living in Detroit as that time were nearly all French Canadians, and others who had come from England, Ireland, and Scotland. Only a very few were from the American colonies. There was no form of local government in effect under Canadian laws, except, perhaps, there were some rules laid down and enforced for the prevention of fires. These rules were necessary for the protection and preservation of the place, and were such as the necessities of the case demanded.

There were no local officers excepting justices of the peace and notaries public, and these men were appointed by the British military authorities and were not elected.

The self government that came into operation immediately upon the coming of the Americans was scarcely known to the people of Detroit at that time. The town meetings of New England were looked upon by the British officials as being the cause of the Revolutionary war and every effort was made to prevent their introduction in Canada.

American rule brought with it the desire for local self-government, and fostered and encouraged ideas that were then latent in the people who were here. Only a few American civilians came with Wayne. It has been stated that James Henry, a native of Pennsylvania, was in Detroit when Wayne came, and that within a short time five or six other Americans came to settle in the place.

Under American rule seven justices of the peace were appointed August 19, 1796, by Winthrop Sargent, acting governor of the Northwest Territory. These justices were Robert Navarre, James May, James Abbott, Lewis Beaufait, Joseph Voyer, Francis Navarre, and Nathan Williams. The entire number were Canadian citizens and not one had ever lived in the older American colonies. In the following year, 1797, Solomon Sibley came, originally from New England and immediately from Marietta. It was ascertained in 1798 that the Northwest Territory was entitled to be governed by a legislative body or council, and an election was held in Detroit on the third Monday in December, 1798, and Solomon Sibley was elected a member of the assembly. His opponent in this election was James May, a native of Birmingham, England, who had never resided in the United States until he became a citizen by virtue of Jay's Treaty of 1794.

Two other members of this council were elected January 15, 1799. There were three men who claimed to have received this election, Charles Francois Chabert de Joncaire, a native Canadian, Oliver Wiswell, and Jacob Visger. The two latter gentlemen were the accepted members and were native Americans; Wiswell was a recent accession to Detroit, but Visger had lived here for many years, coming originally from Schenectady.

In the year 1798 or 1799 a petition of the citizens of Detroit for the establishment of a local government was drawn up, numerously signed and presented to the general court of the Territory. This petition was as follows:

To the Honorable the Justices of the General Court of the Territory of the United States North West of the River Ohio—
The petition of the Inhabitants of the Town of Detroit in said Territory Humbly Sheweth

That in Conformity to a certain Statute Law of this Territory, wherein among other things it is and stands Enacted, "that if

"shall be desirous to acquire and enjoy the powers and immunities
"of a Corporation or body politic in Law, it shall and may be
"Lawfull for them so to do, first having prefer'd to your honors
"their petition for that purpose, therein Specifying the Objects,

Article 3rd That it shall be capaciated to seu, or be seued;—plead, or be impleaded; Grant or receive, by its Corporate name, to purchase lands and hold them to the benefit of themselves and successors, and do all other acts which natural Persons may.

 Dollars—

Article 7 That said Corporation shall extend to and Include all the Inhabitants to the distance of one mile on each side of the Town.

The general court, to which this petition was addressed, was the supreme court of the Territory. At the time this petition was presented to the court that body had the right to act upon it by the provision of an act passed July 6, 1798; but as the court sat very infrequently in Detroit the petition never was called up for action, and the act of 1798 was repealed the 19th of December, 1799.

A bill was introduced in Congress to divide the Northwest Territory and establish the territory of Indiana. This was passed May 7, 1800, and the eastern line of the new territory was the line of the present state of Indiana projected northward to the national boundary line. This act left Detroit and the eastern half of Michigan in the Northwest Territory, and placed the remaining portion of Michigan, together with Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, in the territory of Indiana.

The second session of the territorial assembly of the Northwest Territory met at Chillicothe, November 5, 1800. The Detroit members were Solomon Sibley, Oliver Wiswell, and Jacob Visger; though Wiswell did not sit in the assembly as there was some doubt about the validity of his election.

Upon the separation of Indiana Territory the office that was held in the upper house, or council, by Henry Vanderburgh became vacant, because he was a resident of the new territory and therefore could not hold office in the old territory from which Indiana was separated. It became necessary to appoint a new member to the council of the Northwest Territory in his place.

President John Adams appointed Solomon Sibley to this vacancy, December 3, 1800. The term of office was for five years from the date of the appointment of Vanderburgh in 1799.

The election for members of the second assembly for Wayne County took place in Detroit October 14th, 15th, and 16th, 1800. The limits of Wayne County had been greatly curtailed by the erection of Indiana Territory, which took more than half the county, but the electors lived mostly in Detroit and on the River Raisin (French Town, now Monroe). The contestants at this election were George McDougall, Colonel Charles Francois Chabert de Joncaire, Jonathan Schieffelin, Benjamin Huntington, Joseph Cissne, James May, and Jacob Visger. Sibley was not a contestant, as he expected to receive the appointment as member of the council.

Again the election was contested, but the accepted members were Chabert, Schieffelin, and McDougall.

The assembly met at Chillicothe in November, 1801.

One cannot, as a traveler, visit Chillicothe in the fall of the year, now, without noticing and being pleased with the aspect and location. It is not a busy market place, but its wide streets with overhanging branches of great trees that seem almost to meet in the air, its quiet surroundings and well kept yards and lawns, are pleasing and restful; it is an ideal place for the meeting of an assembly to create laws for the government of a people. No disturbances here to prevent that quiet and useful discussion that should prevail in every legislative body. And yet in 1801 there was much discontent and disturbance in the place. The choice of Chillicothe for a capital, instead of Cincinnati, where the assembly had previously met, was felt by Governor St. Clair to be a political move on the part of Congress. St. Clair's open criticism of the act displeased the people, and on the 25th of December it was seriously proposed to burn the Governor in effigy. The plan would have been successful had it not been for the interference of one of the members of the council. The next night the rioters undertook to create a disturbance in the house in which the Governor was a boarder. Mr. Schieffelin lived in the same place. He also was attacked, and, drawing a brace of pistols, he drove the rioters and disturbers from the house. These were political events taking a concrete form of revolution and rebellion.

The immediate result of this riot was a bill to change the location of the seat of government from Chillicothe to Cincinnati. The bill passed and became a law on the first of January, 1802.

There was another bill in the assembly which passed and was approved December 21, 1801, which incidentally became of interest to Detroit. This bill declared the assent of the territory to the alteration of the boundary lines of the states to be formed in the Northwest Territory from the lines laid down in the Ordinance of 1787.

There was considerable discussion over the bill and much hard feeling resulted. Many of the people wanted to form a state government. Governor St. Clair and his friends undertook to force the passage of the bill of December 21, hoping thereby to postpone, or prevent, the formation of the new state.

It was provided in the Ordinance of 1787 that when the Northwest Territory was divided into states, the line of division between the states should run in an easterly and westerly direction through the south end of Lake Michigan. If a state was now formed to include what was left of the old Northwest Territory, Detroit would have to be excluded unless the Ordinance was changed so as to allow the eastern portion of the present Michigan to become part of the proposed state of Ohio. Petitions and protests numerous signed were sent to Congress for the purpose of influencing the action of that body. The bill as originally introduced in Congress included the eastern part of Michigan in the new proposed state, but the strenuous opposition of the people of Detroit led to an amendment so that the boundary lines laid down in the Ordinance were not altered.

It was in this amended form that the bill became a law, April 30, 1802, and thereafter, until June 30, 1805, Detroit was located in the Territory of Indiana. The subsequent change in the boundary lines at the time Michigan was seeking admission as a state, whereby the Toledo district was included in Ohio, led to the, so-called, Toledo war.

While these proceedings were taking place before Congress, efforts were being made before the assembly at Chillicothe to incorporate the town of Detroit. A petition of the citizens of Detroit was presented to the assembly and a bill drafted for discussion. The bill was amended and passed the lower house, but could not be made satisfactory to both houses and it was referred to a committee of conference. Finally, near the end of the session, both houses agreed upon the form, and it became a law on the 18th day of January, 1802. It was largely the work of Solomon Sibley, and when he returned to Detroit at the end of the session, a public meeting was held at which he was voted the "Freedom of the Town," the village being specially illuminated for the occasion. The act speaks for itself and needs no further introduction.

Respectfully yours,
